

HOMESTEAD ACT VS DAWES ACT

Homestead Act vs Dawes Act

The Homestead Act

The Homestead Act granted 160 acres of potentially free land to anyone over 21 years of age who could pay a small fee for the land and live on it for 5 years. By the end of the act, the land for that year (1862) was the largest and the land for that year (1862) was the largest and the land for that year (1862) was the largest.

Initially opposed by both Republicans and Democrats during the American Civil War, it was the Republican party that passed the Homestead Act, along with the construction of a transcontinental railroad, in 1862. President Lincoln signed the bill into law while the nation was in the throes of war.

Some difficult families took advantage of the Homestead Act between 1862 and 1890, while countless others used other means to build a life out west, such as buying land from railroad companies or simply illegally taking a claim.

Building a life in the West was not easy. Settling thousands of families, many families built homes out of land, the roads and left under the tough winter weather. Once they changed to settled farmers, people found life in the western territory hard and difficult. These settlers brought some knowledge and hard work, but they also brought some diseases and crops. Of the thousands of thousands who moved west using the Homestead Act, about one-third failed to claim their land. By 1900, the third who claimed, the West provided them with some opportunities and a chance to succeed.

The Dawes Act

By the 1880s, much of the western "frontier" had been settled, but thousands of people were still interested in acquiring land for new opportunities. At the same time, Native American reservations, which stretched from the north to the south of the United States, were closed to many settlers and farmers. Congress passed a law to settle the "Indian problem" and further encourage settlers to live through the Dawes Severalty Act of 1887.

The Dawes Act, which broke the large government goal of assimilating Native Americans into mainstream society, divided existing reservations into individual allotments of about 160 acres of land. Native Americans made heads of household were assigned these allotments in trust. If they farmed them well successfully, they would gain complete ownership and could eventually after 25 years. Land that went unassigned was sold to land-hungry settlers.

The lands allotted to Native Americans were typically unsuitable for farming, and not too small for raising livestock, especially for people accustomed to independent agriculture. Thus, Native people struggled to build successful farms on their new allotments. By 1900, the law was amended to allow Native Americans to leave their lands, and by 1907 they could sell their allotments. In 1908, the U.S. government passed additional legislation that required government agents to determine Native American "competency" before taking over the 25-year trust. All of these factors contributed to many Native people of their lands. Native Americans lost 160 million acres in 1887, they lost just 75 million in 1906, and a more million by 1910.

Select the correct Legislation for the Description	Homestead Act	Dawes Act
Received free land if farmed for 12 years	☐	☐
Had to assimilate to American culture	☐	☐
Encouraged people to move West	☐	☐
People began to build and farm	☐	☐
Had to move onto reservation land	☐	☐

The Dawes Act passed in 1887 under President Grover Cleveland, allowed the federal government to break up tribal lands.

Select TWO causes to pass the act.

- A To assimilate American Indians into U.S. society
- B To turn American Indian reservations into corporate farming
- C To end wars between American Indians and the U.S. Military
- D To promote American Indian investment in private industry
- E To sell American Indian tribal lands to settlers
