

A BOY CALLED CHRISTMAS

THE MAGIC OF GIVING

By Matt Haig

Matt Haig's story of how a little boy from a remote part of Finland grew up to become Father Christmas is a magical story full of love and adventure. This extract is from near the end of the story when Nikolas is an old man and is thinking about what he can do to spread happiness further. He goes to the Elf Council to suggest an idea which involves a sleigh, and a reindeer with a red nose...

It takes some people a long time to work out exactly what they are here for. In Nikolas's case it took him another forty years.

He was now sixty-two years old. He had not only kept his beard, as the Truth Pixie suggested, but he had been leader of the Elf Council for A Very Long Time.

In that time he had preserved and expanded happiness in Ethelton. He had started a weekly spickle dance (with singing Tonttegubbs) in the village hall, given free toys to every newborn elf, converted the towers into a toy workshop, established a University of Advanced Toymaking, expanded the School of Sleighcraft, set up the Pixie-Elf alliance, signed a peace treaty with the trolls, invented the minor pie, and cherry, and gingerbread men, and had raised the elf minimum wage to five hundred chocolate coins a week.

But he still felt he needed to do more. He knew he needed to do more because he was still getting older by the day. Most elves – with the exception of Father Tops and a few others – had stopped aging at around forty, and it was getting a bit silly. He was taking so long to find his purpose. He loved helping the elves, but it was time to help the people that part of him still belonged to. The people he had left behind in their world, one that was too often full of loss and pain and sadness. He could nurse them. He would lie awake in bed at night and hear their voices in his head. He could feel the whole world in there. The good and the bad. The naughty and the nice.

One Sunday night in spring, when there was no moon, he took Blitzen from the field and flew beyond the mountain.

There was no better feeling than flying through the sky on the back of a reindeer. Even after a lifetime of doing so, Nikolas – who was now so comfortable with the name Father Christmas he called himself Father Christmas – loved the magical feeling of zooming through the sky. They kept flying. Right across Finland, across the forest where he last saw his father, searching for him, the way he always searched for him whenever he flew. It was foolish. His father had died long ago, but it was an old habit. They flew on into southern Denmark, over towns and cities, over the small fishing port of Helsinki, where travelers and other boats waited for the fishermen who would take them out onto the rough seas again.

Father Christmas desperately wanted to speak to one of his own kind, but he had long vowed to the elves that he would keep their secret. He knew they were right. Humans probably still couldn't be trusted to know about elves and their magic. But that was only because human lives could be so hard.
