

Unlike symmetrical shapes that are static in nature, spirals are brimming with energy and movement. One important point to remember is that you must plan for the eventual size required. You cannot start with a small spiral and grow on a larger, identical section – you would need to add to the number of coils or merge existing coils and reshape.

how to clip a spiral

1 Start with a cone that has been clipped several times to create dense growth. If you intend to make deep coils, the specimen should have a single node from which all the side branches radiate. For a piece of string or raffia to be tied to the plant and wound around to extend, angling the string along the diagonal to make a 'spiral cut'. Match the string to natural gaps in the foliage. The number of turns will depend on the height of the plant – typically three or four.

2 Use a pair of secateurs or pruners, angled from above to above, down to cut the initial growth using the string as a guide. Be gentle at first, working from the top downwards trying to keep the foliage as natural as possible. Then work your way to the centre, cutting out any large branches with the secateurs.

3 Continue to clip, deepening the groove and creating a coil and a horizontal collar. Finally, stand the plant in a sheltered environment, providing optimum growing conditions that will help the plant recover and fill out more quickly. Clip a spring or two summer to maintain the shape.

SUITSABLE PLANTS

Upright growing species and cultivars with low foliage such as:
Rosa sempervirens (haz) Yucca filifera (mossbush)
Chamaecyparis Scaphocephalus
Juniperus (juniper) Myrt

Right The low spiral, clipped to mirror the central cone, appears to be made from a green garden water wheel & central post.
