Gilles Simard, Olivier Doucet, Sarah Bernard, 2010 This study clarifies the role of organizational justice in the relationship between human resources management practices and commitment Specifically we develop and test a model in which the principal forms of justice distributive procedural and interactional represent mediating variables in relationships between affective commitment and the four types of HRM practices information sharing knowledge development non monetary recognition and power sharing included in the model developed by Lawler 1986 Meyer and Smith 2000 underscore that because few empirical studies have explored the relationship between HRM practices and commitment it is important to determine how such practices influence employee commitment to organizations Their results have shed light on the role of perception of organizational support and procedural justice as a mediating factor between certain HRM practices and organizational commitment Consistent with the recommendation of these authors our model rests on the theory of social exchange Blau 1964 and posits the three forms of organizational justice as mediating variables Social exchange unlike economic exchange implies a relationship of exchange through unspecified obligations between the parties Through the reciprocity norm individuals in a climate of mutual trust maintain an exchange relationship with others to whom they feel obliged because they have received something from them In a company this pattern may correspond to organizations expectation that employees will develop favorable attitudes such as commitment in return for the introduction of HRM practices Nonetheless the specialized literature also clearly highlights theoretical links between social exchange and perceptions of organizational justice Greenberg 1987 Moorman 1991 In this perspective organizational justice encourages the development of effective commitment by enhancing employees feeling of reciprocity toward the organization a sentiment created by the introduction of HRM practices As part of this research project a questionnaire was distributed in September 2001 to 232 managers of financial services of a private company operating in the Canadian banking sector Of these questionnaires 134 were returned corresponding to a respectable response rate of 58% To test our research hypothesis we carried out hierarchical regression analyses according to the steps described by Kenny Kashy and Bolger 1998 These analyses confirmed our hypothesis by demonstrating that each of the forms of justice indeed represents a mediating variable between the practices specified by Lawler 1986 and affective commitment More specifically we conclude that 1 non monetary recognition has an indirect effect on commitment through the three forms of justice 2 interactional justice is a mediating variable between knowledge development and commitment 3 procedural justice is a mediating variable between the practices of autonomy initiative and commitment and 4 consulting has both a direct and indirect effect on affective commitment through procedural justice Our observations corroborate the results of previous studies Meyer and Smith 2000 Schappe 1996 that had affirmed a mediating effect of procedural justice between certain practices and organizational commitment This study also makes a significant contribution with important theoretical and practical implications First our research supplements the literature on this topic by proposing an integrating model that measures the simultaneous effect of a larger number of practices than previous studies and that integrates the three principal forms of justice as a mediating variable Moreover our results demonstrate that organizations should pay attention to their employees perception of justice if they want to significantly increase the employees affective commitment by putting HRM practices in place Moreover regarding the individual effects of practices our results suggest that organizations should first target non monetary recognition practices followed by power sharing practices consultation autonomy initiative and knowledge development practices Lastly our results confirm that the competitive advantage of successful firms mainly arises from their capacity to increase the added value of their human resources Becker and Huselid 1999 To attain organizational success they must innovate in HRM notably by applying practices that favor the adoption of positive attitudes and behaviors toward the organization Companies should thus encourage managers to act in compliance with equity impartiality and respect to stimulate the affective commitment of their employees and maximize the investment required by the introduction of HRM practices
