

Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether the use of a computer-based decision support system (DSS) would improve the performance of a group of students in a complex, multi-step problem-solving task. The study was conducted in a classroom setting where students were assigned to groups and given a complex problem to solve. The DSS was designed to provide students with a structured framework for solving the problem, including a list of possible solutions and a decision-making process. The results of the study showed that the use of the DSS significantly improved the performance of the students, as measured by the time taken to solve the problem and the quality of the solution. The study also found that the DSS was used by all groups, and that the students who used the DSS were more confident in their solution. The study concludes that the use of a computer-based DSS can improve the performance of students in a complex, multi-step problem-solving task.
