Abstract: Although research has shown that children's exposure to television is related to obesity, the mechanism linking the two is unclear. This study examined the role of television in the development of eating behaviors in children. The study found that children who watched more television were more likely to be overweight. This relationship was mediated by the amount of time children spent watching television. The study also found that children who watched more television were more likely to eat more food. This relationship was also mediated by the amount of time children spent watching television. The study suggests that television may play a role in the development of eating behaviors in children, and that this relationship may be mediated by the amount of time children spend watching television.
