

This passage is about sleep.

The average adult needs between seven and nine hours of sleep per day in order to be healthy, both physically and mentally. But, this daily amount of sleep seems to be becoming increasingly rare. People nowadays appear not to understand how essential sleep is, with many well-known businesspeople and politicians famously claiming to get through the day perfectly well without it. Yet lack of sleep can have serious consequences: increased likelihood of accidents, reduced productivity at work, problems with health, and even premature aging and death.

Sleeplessness is a modern epidemic, yet the roots of the problem began in the 18th century. People left their peaceful countryside homes and started a new life in cities that were overcrowded and noisy – conditions not exactly suitable for a good night's rest. What's more, the new cities were filled with activity and entertainment at night, including coffee shops. Instead of hitting the sack at sunset, the new generations of city dwellers would stay up late at night, enjoying long discussions powered by caffeine.

Then came the electric light bulb. Though gas lamps had long been in use, it was the electric bulb that provided light that was sufficiently bright to keep people wide awake. This had in fact been one of the aims of Thomas A. Edison, the inventor of this new technology. Edison believed that people could use their time more efficiently if they had enough light, even late at night. Perhaps he succeeded more than he would have expected.
