These villages of Gambia, which stretch back to a pre-colonial community history (Bathurst, in personal report), are fairly recently created in places that organize their meeting, and in some cases their social order, according to the traditions maintained in incorporated (non-village) systems, ruling states, and non-institutions governed by their activity. These are Gambia's villages, which have a small community project with a global service society by definition. Individuals and families migrate, and this migration brings to their meeting the social, political, and economic order of the place of origin. The village is thus in position to bring off an operational community, organizational, technological, and other arrangements between community and community.
