There is a common view that the "new" social movements are a response to the failure of the old social movements. This view is based on the idea that the old social movements were limited in their scope and impact, and that the new social movements are more comprehensive and effective. However, this view is based on a number of assumptions that are not necessarily valid. First, it assumes that the old social movements were limited in their scope and impact. This is not necessarily true. Second, it assumes that the new social movements are more comprehensive and effective. This is also not necessarily true. Third, it assumes that the new social movements are a response to the failure of the old social movements. This is also not necessarily true. In fact, the new social movements are a continuation of the old social movements, and they are not necessarily more comprehensive or effective than the old social movements.
