6 Steps to Prevent Deadly Prostate Cancer

One of the most devastating things a man can hear from his doctor is that he has prostate cancer. Unfortunately, it happens all too often in our modern society.

Make no mistake, prostate cancer is serious business. The American Cancer Society estimates that there were 220,800 new cases of prostate cancer in 2014, and 27,540 deaths caused by the disease,¹ making it the second most lethal cancer for men, behind lung cancer.

For men over 75, prostate cancer is the most common cause of death. In fact, more than 70 percent of men 80 and older have prostate cancer.²⁻³ Needless to say, men should do everything they can to prevent developing prostate cancer.

In this month's issue of Natural Way to Health, I will tell you why traditional prostate cancer screening isn't working, and give you six important steps you can take to keep from getting this disease.

You Don't Need a PSA Test

Conventional medicine treats all cancers virtually the same way: surgery, chemotherapy, and radiation. Prostate cancer is no exception.

The way that doctors check for the presence of prostate cancer is with what's called a prostate specific antigen (PSA) test. But the PSA test was not actually designed as a screening test. It was designed to help monitor prostate cancer that had already developed.

As PSA levels increase, it is assumed that prostate cancer is growing. However, PSA levels can be elevated without the existence of cancer. For instance, elevated PSA can also indicate an inflamed or infected prostate.

In medical school, I was taught that it is important to diagnose cancer early so you can start treatment before it spreads to other parts of the body. The medical-industrial healthcare establishment parrots this strategy regularly.

But do you really need a PSA test?

You would think that early cancer diagnosis is better than later diagnosis. But an early diagnosis is beneficial only if there is a treatment that can prolong lifespan.

In England, PSA screening is not routinely done, as it is in the United States. Not surprisingly, the screening results in more cases of prostate cancer being diagnosed in the U.S.

However, the mortality rates for prostate cancer are the same in the two countries.⁴ The unchanged
