- For younger students, we can teach this expansive view of writing with "wondering sessions." Wonder is when we ask questions and get curious about a topic, a fact, or an idea. Model this and then have students write I wonder on a blank page in their writer's notebook on a regular basis. If students practice wondering, their writing will expand.
- Another way to question a thesis is to ask, "So what?" Write those two words on the board and ask students to "so-what" their main point in a conversation with their partner. Example: Maybe Elvis is not dead. So what? If the thesis does not pass the so-what test, students ask more questions to dig deeper and expand.
- Make a question wall in your classroom and give students an opportunity to post their questions on that wall. Review the questions with your class and try answering them. Ask the question, "What makes a good question?"
- Find intriguing statistics facts from a source such as Harper's Index. Here is one Bruce Ballenger uses with his college classes:

Portion of men whose attractiveness is judged by U.S. women to be worse than average: 4/5

Portion of women about whom U.S. men say this: 2/5

Now pair up students and have them ask each other questions about these statistics. What do they mean? What truth can you infer? Have students grow a thesis from their observations about the statistics.
