- If you already have a relationship with your therapist, then you can skip this step. If you don't, then you need to find a therapist who can help you with your anxiety. You can find a therapist by asking your doctor for a referral, or by searching for a therapist on the Internet. You can also ask your friends for a referral.
- Once you have found a therapist, you need to schedule an appointment. You can call the therapist's office to schedule an appointment, or you can email them. You can also schedule an appointment online.
- When you go to your first appointment, you will need to provide some information about your anxiety. You will also need to discuss your goals for therapy.
- Your therapist will then work with you to develop a treatment plan. This plan will include goals for therapy, and it will also include a list of exercises that you can do at home.

The results of the study's primary and secondary analyses show that the more information provided, the more likely it was that the study would be published. The results also suggest that the more information provided, the more likely it was that the study would be published in a peer-reviewed journal.
