This paper provides some evidence on one aspect of international investment the impacts of domestic tax policy on foreign direct investment in the United States The possible impacts which are discussed in the first section are complex For example an investment incentive which applies to both domestic and foreign investors would be expected to result in an increased foreign investment in the U S On the other hand a savings incentive which has no direct impact on foreign investors would nevertheless tend to increase domestic investors demand for capital assets thereby driving down the returns expected by foreign investors and possibly resulting in significant decreases in foreign investment Because of measurement difficulties we are only partly successful in obtaining precise estimates of this sort of impact However the results we do obtain suggest that foreign investment in the U S is strongly affected in the manner predicted by changes in domestic tax policy Reports
