Identifying the Situation
After you read any AP® reading passage, ask yourself the following questions:

Identifying AP® Reading Passage History Facts

1. Approximate year?
2. What was the state of the world during this year? (All the questions tend to be centered on the history course and not around the world.)
3. Research the AP® history course itself from this time period (are the test administrators or writers up to date on this period?)
4. What was the AP® curriculum about AP® the program during this time?
5. Research the history course and period itself to discuss.

Identifying the "Cause and Effect Situation (Historical Argument Scenario)"

1. Approximate year?
2. What was the state of the world during this year? (All the questions tend to be centered on the history course and not around the world.)
3. Research the AP® history course itself from this time period (are the test administrators or writers up to date on this period?)
4. Research the history course and period itself to discuss.

Research/History Skills
The AP® course will discuss the world without a change book (which is not a reality). AP® history is the only course that requires that the students be able to read and write about history. The AP® course is a history course, not a history course.
