These programs of further capital raising, such as those made by the two banks and the insurance companies, have been approved by the Federal Reserve Board. The Board is concerned that if possible, the companies should be permitted to raise money through existing plans. But that may not be possible for companies, because other plans for new capital are not available. The companies are not allowed to raise money in the form of new debt, and they are not allowed to raise money in the form of new equity. The Board is concerned that the companies will be forced to raise money in the form of new equity, which would be a bad thing for the companies.
