Sallaberger, 1999-01-01 Among cuneiform texts only letters address directly a concrete historical person Letters being texts composed and used in everyday verbal interaction they replace direct communication This specific situational context provokes basic questions such as from the point of view of the ancient letter writer what are the conventionally possible ways of expressing the intentions of the sender And from the modern researcher's standpoint how can we detect the tone of a given letter This study focuses neither on the facts represented and the persons communicating nor on the system of the language but is rather concerned with the specific rule governed use of language in interaction The method employed is a combination of the philological treatment of the texts with questions and insights from linguistic pragmatics discourse analysis and text linguistics The book concentrates on the corpus of Old Babylonian letters from Mesopotamia The topics treated include address behaviour i.e. use and interdependence of term of address greeting and form of address of the verb the structure and the basic function of an Old Babylonian letter the polite speech acts of gratitude and of asking a favour rational argumentation in everyday verbal interaction
