

Upper-Limb Prosthetics: Part 2

Insights from those who have lost one arm

by Douglas G. Smith, MD

"Life is only this place, this time, and these people right here and now."

— Vincent Collins, artist

If an upper-limb prosthesis could truly replace the human hand and arm, the job of healthcare professionals would be easy. We would give people exactly what they lost. Unfortunately, prostheses can perform only a fraction of the countless functional motions our arms and hands do automatically.

Because we cannot replace everything, we try to give people with single (unilateral) upper-limb loss the devices that will help them do the things they simply can't do with just one hand. One-handed tasks are very difficult. But with training, practice and simple tools, many people can learn to do amazing things with a single hand. A prosthesis becomes an enormous help for tasks that are difficult with one hand, and a necessity for tasks that simply cannot be done one-handed.

People who've lost both upper limbs (bilateral) are almost totally dependent on prosthetic technology, help from others, or both. Without prostheses, bilateral upper-limb amputees cannot eat, button a shirt, type, perform personal hygiene or any of the things that can be done one-handed. Matching upper-limb prosthetics with each unique individual is extremely important for people with either unilateral or bilateral limb loss. It's not an easy task, and peoples' needs can change, both over time and even in the course of a single day.

There are many upper-limb prosthetic devices to choose from, and their form and functions vary as much as the needs of the people who use them. Some prostheses look very realistic. Some are very high-tech, even robotic in appearance. Some prostheses don't move at all; others can be set in specific positions. Still others are mechanical, powered by muscles, cables and springs. There are prosthetic devices that are activated by electrical signals run with batteries and motors. There also is increasing use of prosthetics that are combinations of anatomic-appearing, mechanical and electrical devices. Unlike the old days, when prosthetics were easily classified as passive, mechanical or electric, it's hard to force today's upper-limb prostheses into a single category. Sometimes, it's even impossible.

The Brain, the Body and Motion

One way to contrast the differences between the arms and hands that God gave us with upper-limb prosthetics is to compare the limited number of ways a prosthesis can be moved to the almost infinite number of ways we can move our natural hands and arms. The movements of our joints can happen simultaneously, smoothly, with brain and body working together in perfect unison.

When you pick up a cup, you don't consciously think about the way your shoulder and elbow extend, your arm rotates, your hand opens, your fingers close around the cup, your elbow bends and your hand brings the drink to your mouth. You just reach for it, drink, and put it down. Your brain tells the parts of your arm, from the shoulder down to your fingertips, to work in a continuous, fluid motion. It's so precise, yet so simple. We can even do it while doing something else, like reading a book or watching TV.

But a person with an above-elbow prosthesis must learn to rethink how each and every joint works to accomplish the same simple task. Each individual movement to get the cup and take a drink must be consciously and painstakingly thought out:

- Shoulder – forward
- Elbow – bend
- Forearm – rotate the thumb up
- Hand – open around the cup
- Hand – close slowly
- Elbow – lift without spilling
- Head – move forward to the cup
- Sip – Finally!

Each prosthetic joint movement must be executed in a specific sequence. Then the person must go through another set of sequential motions to put the drink back down. And a person with an above-elbow amputation must watch the cup constantly because, without our natural elbow, we cannot accurately guide our hand to the cup and pick it up without maintaining visual contact with it. Compared to our natural ability, operating an upper-limb prosthesis can be time-consuming and awkward.

Profiles: People Who Have Lost One Arm

There's a world of difference between the various "makes and models" of upper-limb prosthetics because there are so many different kinds of people with unique needs. Recognizing the differences in people's prosthetic needs makes choosing and fitting the proper upper-limb device very important.

Devices count, but it's the people who use them who really matter. They say a picture is worth a thousand words. Hopefully, the following profiles of various upper-limb prosthesis users will illustrate their diverse prosthetic needs. And, as they say in the movies, any similarity between the characters, events or locations depicted here and actual people, events or locations is purely coincidental.
